Medical Marijuana Arrives in Kansas City as Green Health Docs Opens Evaluation Clinic

The cannabis industry looks to take Missouri by storm in 2019

Kansas City, MO (April 16, 2019) — Medical marijuana is coming very soon to Missouri, and several businesses are already beginning to sprout up in order to help potential patients get their medical marijuana cards. Obtaining a Missouri medical marijuana card is a requirement before visiting any state-licensed medical marijuana dispensary across Missouri.

Enter Green Health Docs, a medical marijuana evaluation clinic with offices in Maryland, Ohio, North Dakota and now Missouri. Green Health Docs recently opened its doors in Kansas City so patients can get their medical marijuana cards now, ahead of dispensaries opening.

"The City of Fountains has such a rich heritage, not to mention notoriously good barbecue," Dr. Anand Dugar, CEO of Green Health Docs, stated. "This is a place where there are literally thousands of potential qualifying patients. These are people are who are suffering every single day, and seeking health alternatives. Our goal is to educate the public about the benefits of medical marijuana, and see as many of these qualifying patients as we can."

In order to qualify for medical marijuana, Missouri residents must have documented evidence of one of the 21 qualifying conditions, including Alzheimer's disease (or agitation related to), any terminal illness, autism, cancer, Crohn's disease, chronic pain or neuropathy, epilepsy, glaucoma, hepatitis C, HIV/AIDS or cachexia or wasting syndrome, Huntington's disease, IBS, intractable migraines, Lou Gehrig's disease, multiple sclerosis, opioid substitution, Parkinson's disease, PTSD or other "debilitating psychiatric disorders", Tourette syndrome, sickle cell anemia, and seizures.

If you do not have one of the qualifying conditions above, however, the State of Missouri has also added a special clause stating that "any other chronic, debilitating or other medical condition that may be alleviated by marijuana is in the professional judgement of a physician." This means that patients can bring their medical records to a medical marijuana doctor, and this physician can determine if cannabis would help the ailment.

"Missouri is a wonderful state for medical marijuana," Dr. Dugar added. "There are less limitations on what qualifies a patient for medical marijuana, so a physician can make that call — not the state. This will help so many people who need aide in combating their ailments."

Missouri medical marijuana dispensaries are not open just yet but are expected to begin opening in late 2019/early 2020. Medical marijuana patients can, however, grow their own cannabis plants. To do so, patients must first obtain a identification card from the Missouri Department of Health. Patients will be able to grow six plants.

"So many states are finally recognizing the medicinal value of cannabis," Dr. Dugar noted. "And now Missouri has joined that voice. It's up to us to help those patients get the medicine they need."

The Green Health Docs Kansas City clinic is located at 435 Nichols Rd, Suite 200. To contact their offices and set up an evaluation, simply call or text (314) 282-8017. Their support team can walk patients through the entire process, from gathering medical records to obtaining your official Missouri medical marijuana card once the registry opens.
